

Abstract

This paper addresses the discrepancies between the local and international understandings of an aid programs success. Using ethnographic interviews to contrast the success of a completed AIDS intervention with the reality of women who work on the ground with sex workers. The local NGO were local agents of the international AIDS reduction program. The paper shows the problems of a statistically based system of assessment and presents a model of local analysis for aid.