

Abstract

This paper examines the connections between gender construction, the middle class, the feminist movement, development policy, urbanization, education, social trends, media and the rapidly growing population of young people, specifically women. Through qualitative interviews and surveys the research aims to understand how young women are utilizing the autonomous space provided by social media. This is specifically analyzed for how communication via social media creates a more comfortable and less restricted domain for women to create relationships with men.